Straw Indicates Repeal
It would scarcely be safe to assume that the "test" vote taken in the House of Representatives yesterday, on a motion to end debate on the repeal of the neutrality bill, indicates the figures of the final vote on repeal of the arms embargo.

It is entirely conceivable, however, that some members of the House may have voted to terminate an entirely futile debate on a matter of procedure and yet without inconsistency might vote against repeal itself when opportunity arose.

It is not surprising that the measure did not pass. It is not surprising that the measure did not pass. It is not surprising that the measure did not pass.

A Thought
If you forsake the Lord, and serve strange gods, then he will turn and do unto you, and consume you, after that he hath done for you.—Job 31-35.

Russia Remains Neutral
One may make what will of Foreign Commissioner Molotov's statement of Russia's view of the European war.

It was on the other hand, ostensibly defensive of Germany, and many and superficially might be regarded as a brusque expression of preference for the friendship of the Nazis over the friendship of France and Great Britain.

But in it, nevertheless, there was nothing even approaching a definite promise of military support for the British.
