No Loss To Anybody

It is not unlikely that, as they pursue their world peace offensive, the Russians will announce the dissolution of the Communist international propaganda agency which is the symbol of the Russian effort to infiltrate the outside world. If this decision comes, it will pose as a symbol of Russian cooperation in the promotion of the theory of coexistence, and will be accepted. It was a symbol of a concession of attempted Russian interference in the domestic politics of other countries. As such, it will be welcome.

So Far, Good

A good assessment of Geneva would be that it avoided conspicuous success. While made the modest gains in the realm of actual policy that were all its participants expected, and that it will be, for the future, what its respective participants make of it in their own attitudes and actions. The most gains in the realm of actual policy were represented in two concessions, one by each side. The Russians finally agreed that, for future discussions, the problems of German unity and European security should be regarded as closely linked. They had wanted to discuss European security first, and let Germany hang on the vine. For its part, the West half yielded to the Soviet insistence that, when the big powers did get down to serious talk on German unity, both halves of Germany should be represented. At or at least in contact with the big power talks.

Some Other Notions

Some other notions ought to be made on the record, however. One should be that the Communism has itself become more of a white elephant than an asset. The way the Russians themselves ignored it and abandoned it, as they restored relations with the Communists in Yugoslavia, offers one proof of that. And the growing opposition of Communist parties everywhere to become rationalist Communist parties, rather than mere carbon copies of Moscow, offers another such proof. Russia can do better for Russia, these days. If it does, it will have the Communism ghosting about.

Man Playing Tube in Steam Cabinet

The man in this Steam Cabinet is his colleague, Dr. Schweitzer, who has been trying to get his weight down to a trim 250 for the play 'Hot Licks'. He will play it and be trained for it. Yet it seems to be the underlying assumption of the IQ procedure that a test at age 10 will also predict the level of intelligence at 20.
