Recession Politics

One may regret, but one cannot really castigate too heavily, the inevitable tactics of political parties that find before them. After all, each party will do it. Beyond that, this is our national and our democratic way of discussing issues. It produces some light along with its heat. And, in the long run, the party which reaches too eagerly and too recklessly for any particular issue will encounter its reward, in the way the people themselves appraise its judgment and leadership.

So, with the current recession, let it be stated as a matter of course that it is going to be a political football as long as it lasts, with the Republicans who are belittling it and soothing our feelings about it, while the administration tries to keep it from reopening, and with the Democratic role that of exaggerating it, blowing it up, holding the Republicans to blame for it, and claiming that the Republicans don't know how to cure it.

It is an elemental political fact that the recession has gone along and rippled just in time to rescue the Democrats from the virtual disappearance of Sputnik as the issue they hoped to ride to victory next November.

It is an elemental political fact that, just as the Eisenhower administration had to attempt an uneasy defense on the Sputnik issue, until the reality of our own Explorer took the sting out of the issue, so the administration is now forced into an uneasy defense of itself on the recession issue, a defense which likewise will be completely successful only if a decisive obligation by starting to disappear from the national scene.

Even if that is so, it is not to be helped. The issue is there, and politics will have it. But at least we can recognize the nature of the competition upon our politicians, and balance the alarms of one side against the soothing syrup of the other, and even manage to make our own appraisal of the situation for what we think it is, instead of thinking merely the way some politician wants us to.

Not Very Frightened

Library Lines

Leading through "American Motions and Slogans," one of the wacky curious volumes in the Mary Cheney Library's reference collection, can be found an amusing and somewhat heavy and stilted in quality. It was almost weeks before street traffic came close to being as normal as it happened to be this morning, while the storm clouds were still over us.

But that February storm could even become a rather friendly character in memory; this you will remember with resentment, just as a severe annoyance deliberately and maliciously inflicted, riddles much more than outright injury inflicted by chance.

One impression upon it: our plaudits to the town forces who put noticeably ahead of it, even with its drifting; and loving prayers to February 1958.

Walking Heals Congrene

New York Circulation, the scientific journal of the American Heart Association, reports that gangrene of the feet and legs has been successfully treated by letting the patient walk. It reports that, at one medical center, amputations were avoided and the gangrene condition healed in 21 out of 22 cases when the patients were encouraged to get out of bed and walk despite their ailment.
