The easy summary of the news from Washington says that the "President and labor" suffered a great joint defeat when the Senate voted 47 to 45 against the idea of busting up Senator Dirksen's filibuster against repeal of that section of the Taft-Hartley act which permits individual states to legislate "right to work" laws if they so please.

The vote was indeed one-sided, especially when one realizes that the actual target of the losing side, which had 45 votes, was the 67 votes which would have been two-thirds of the membership necessary to close debate. But the actual sentiment in the Senate was not as one-sided as the vote, either against President Johnson, or against organized labor. What the sentiment was one-sided about was the wisdom, desirability and necessity of pushing this particular proposition, slone, at this particular No one inside or outside the Senate, or in the White House, or in organized labor, really thinks that the right to work laws which exist in 19 states are playing any decisive role in the progress and health of the American labor move-No one thinks that it will make very much difference to the strength of the labor movement in these 19 states if they should be forced, by Congressional laws against the union shop. And, in states where there is now no right to work law, not even industry itself is united in the idea that it would like to have right to work laws passed.

Some employers have come to prefer to do business with a union shop, on the ground that such a relationship provides both simplicity and stability. No, what President Johnson has been doing from the moment he raised this special promise in his inaugural address has been something more important for its political symbolism than for its actual importance in the field of labor relations. He wanted to perform some great token favor for organized labor, to show his gratitude for its support at the polls, to bind it closer to him for the future. Conceivably, organized labor itself might have had some other legislative favor in mind it would have considered more valuable and meaningful. But, on being offered this particular plum, it has had no recourse but to carry through with the campaign to get it. In the Senate vote Monday, the true nature and the true importance of the repeal proposition were appraised ac curately, and judged to be just about on a level with the relaxed, genial kind of filibuster Senator Dirksen has been leading against it. On any question of real importance either President Johnson or organized isbor would have more friends and more support in the Senate than they got in the vote Monday.

A Dour View

The famed Scottish trusts, whose reputation for shrewdness is world-wide, and who are famous for their historic ability to be able to make more money in American securities than anybody else, are beginning to create apprehensive quivers among American investment experts who are still sober enough to suspect that bonanza, not even that of The Great, Affluent Society, never lasts

The Scottish trusts are trimming their American investments. The polite explanation of this is that they are adjusting to new British tax laws, which are less kindly toward profits made in American dealings. But there is also the possibility that the managers of the Scottish trusts, so famed for their detachment, perspective, and immunity to the unreliable, impulsive, and often purely emotional tides of market feeling, have been reading the American picture with some small degree of apprehension. They may feel, it is reported, that a few of our prices are too high, and a few of our own estimates of what will be sound for the future a little too

The same financial pages which tell us of the newly developed special caution of the Scottish trusts also provide occasional information which might seem s reason for such caution.

in history.

One trend which ought to worry everybody, and not merely the Scottish trusts, is that toward a still higher percentage of installment credit financing in the field of automobile sales. In this calendar year so far, the rise in installment automobile credit has been greater than in any previous year

And the guess is that, if Detroit is going to achieve the nine-million car year it now believes possible with its new models, this will require steep new_expansion of the amount of borrowing Americans do in order to drive. Undue expansion of credit in installment buying was discovered, after the 1929 crash, to have been one of the big causes for that crash, and one that should have been noticed and taken as a warning years before the crash. In the succeeding 35 years, we have learned to do everything, even our in-Full service client of N. E. A. Service, Inc.

stallment buying, in a way that is bigger and better, and, apparently, safer, too. But one is never sure that we have perfected completely our new system in which everything always goes up and nothing ever comes down and it doesn't hurt even if it does try to come down. The Scottish trusts may be acting cannily just because that is their reputation. Or they may really be old-fashioned enough to distrust the new economy, in which deficits and debts are supposed to be good news.

Press Notices Are What Count

Somewhere in the course of human history, there must have been or there soon will be-the cynical individual to coin and make immortal some such phrase as the following: "Give me a man's press notices, and you can take his actual deeds."

Whether it has ever been made or not, that is the maxim that comes to mind as one reads, on Columbus Day, from Yale University, of the "most exciting cartographic discovery of the century." This is a map dated 1440, or 52 years before a certain famous voyage, and this 1440 map contains a good portion of the American continent, namely Greenland, thus substantiating historical conclusions that North European explorers, including one Leif Ericson, were in this hemisphere, and had therefore discovered America, as early as the 11th cen-

Columbus can rest secure in his grave and in his fame and in his titles. For he was the fellow who somehow managed to get the press notices. He was the fellow who managed to discover America at the precise moment somebody was interested in the discovery of America-the moment, therefore, when the world would be disposed to recognize such discovery as an act of some note and importance. Leif Ericson, and all the probably countless other pre-Columbus discoverers of America can take solace and comfort in their graves and in their reputations. They are part of a goodly class of men for whom time and tide were somehow adverse. They have a vast and unheralded company, in the person of the European who probably flew before the Wright Brothers, the Russian who probably sent a wireless message before Marconi, the assistant secretary of state who thought up the Marshall attention is that of the powers of the Governor. The first thing to notice about this is that the positions of the two parties are not today what they used to be in days of yore. The Democrats, in the days when they often possessed a Governor but almost never a whole Legislature, used to be in favor of anything that would make the office of Governor stronger. The Republicans, in the days when they couldn't count on having a Governor, but usually could count on having at least half the Legislature, were content with the classic Connecticut system of a relatively weak Governor. Today the party positions seem reversed, perhaps because, in the era ahead, Repubcilans feel their chances of controlling anything so slight that they are able to indulge themselves in pure theory. One of the propositions th Convention has been discussing seriously is that of adopting for Connecticut the short ballot, so that only a Governor and Lieutenant Governor would be elected, and the Governor would appoint those officials

Ice Capades At Coliseum

00th birthday of Lewis Carroll's amed fairy tale "Alice in Wonlerland" the 28th edition of Ice Capades have chosen this celebrated fantasy as just one of nine great production numbers. And that's only one of the wealth of wonderlands to be unfolded in the all-new exciting world of Ice Capades when it opens at the Eastern States Collseum, West pringfield on Thursday, Nov. s, for two gala weekends.

There's the plush wonderland Old Vienna elegantly revived, "Waltz Rouge," the lush puni." And, for the first time, the spotlight of Ice Capades entire second act will focus on a single theme, a most incredible wonderland, "Salute to the World of Entertainment."
