An Anniversary Of Sorts

Today, Dec. 9, is the first anniversary of "Ethics In International Relations loday," an address delivered by former Secretary of State Dean Acheson at Amherst College. The tone and import of the address may be judged by the following ex-

"So, acts, moral in one relationship, may become quite the reverse in another. Generally speaking, morality often imposes upon those who exercise the powers of government standards of conduct quite different from what might zens .. . . "Moreover, the vocabulary of morals and ethics is inadequate to discuss or test foreign policies of states. We are told that what is ethical is characterized by what is excellent in conduct and that excellence may be judged by what is right and proper, as against what is wrong, by existing standards.

seem right to them as private citi-

"But when we look for standards we find that none exist. What passes for ethical standards for governmental policies in foreign affairs is a collection of moralisms, maxims, and slogans, which neither help nor guide, but only confuse, decision on such complicated matters as the multilateral nuclear force, a common grain price in Europe, policy in Southeast Asia. . . .

"The criteria should be hard-headed in the extreme. Decisions are not helped by considering them in terms of sharing, brotherly love, the Golden Rule, or inducting our citizens into the Kingdom of

"Is it moral to deny ourselves the use of force in all circumstances, when our adversaries employ it, under handy excuses, whenever it seems useful to tip the scales of power against every value we think of as moral and as making life worth living? It seems to me not only a bad bargain, but a stupid one. I would almost say an immoral one. For the very conception of morality seems to me to involve a duty to preserve values outside the contour of our own skins, and at the expense of foregoing much that is desired and pleasant, including-it may be-our own fortunes and lives. . . .

"What, then, is the sound approach to questions of moral policy? I suggest that it is what we might call the strategic approach - to consider various courses of action from the point of view of their bearings upon major objec-

"If you object that is no different from saying that the end justifies the means, I must answer that in foreign affairs only the end can justify the means; that this is not to say that the end justifies any means, or that some ends can justify anything." Thus Mr. Acheson a year ago today.

The anniversary is not being recognized as such anywhere, or being treated as important anywhere, although perhaps it should be.

But, as fate so has it, there is a headline event at Washington which has some possible connection with the Washington's chief disciple of Mr.

Acheson, and perhaps, some think, of the principles and reasonings of the Acheson speech at Amherst, McGeorge Bundy, is this day resigning as special assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, and leaving the White House to become president of the Ford Foundation. Mr. Bundy's crucial role in his White House post seems to have been the apparently decisive and clinching advice he cabled back from Vietnam last winter, leading to the Johnson administration decision to enter the long valley of no choice by embarking on the punitive bombing of North Vietnam. This classic example of a policy in which the end was supposed to justify the means has, in actuality, become a dismal demonstration of the fact that blind alley means can make the attainment of ends so difficult and costly and tragic it runs more chance of destroying its goals than of reaching them. The coolness with which President Johnson has allowed Mr. Bundy to retire from his post of advice and influence, and of occasional very great power, might seem to indicate that the President has experienced some subsequent anguish over the decision he took last February.

It may even mean that the retirement of Mr. Bundy means a dropping off in the supposedly great behind the scenes influence Mr. Acheson has had on the formulation of our policy in Vietnam. But these are questions mainly, it would seem, for future historians. The nature of the major policy decision last February left no room for turning around. We remain on the Acheson-Bundy course even though it is now possible that their hands have been removed from the wheel.

The Day The Odds Were Fixed In staid, conservative Britain, which under such labels and under a traditional primness manages to permit itself vices and dissipations we free-wheeling Americans approach only by stealth, both at the track and off the track betting is legal and therefore a legitimate enterprise, a respectable business,

But a high judicial decision, the other day, put an element of the sporting back in it.

A high court judge ruled that it was just a battle of wits, no more unusual or illegitimate than any effort to conduct a smart operation in the stock markets, when, back on a June day in 1964, an amateur mastermind concocted and operated a clever scheme for "taking" the bookies that day.

Rather than condemning the scheme. the judge observed that it had been "brilliantly successful." This was the way it worked. The mastermind had some 125 people working with him. The plot concerned a single race at a dog track. There were six dogs in the race. The odds on these dogs are set automatically, both at the track and for all the off the track betting around the country, by the operation of the tote board located at the track. That tote board sets the odds by reflecting the bets made at the betting windows located at the track.

When the time came for the race the master mind had selected, he had his operatives lined up in front of all the betting windows. They proved to be slow and clumsy at the windows. But they always eventually made up their minds to bet on the two dogs in the race which were generally considered to be completely out of the running. Then, after having trouble counting their change, they vacated their place at the window to another of their confederates, who went through the same stalling and betting procedures.

In this manner, the betting at the windows at the track was controlled until the race went off. The exclusive betting on the two dogs that couldn't possibly win automatically made them, on the tote board, the heavy favorites, while the other four dogs who had a chance of winning were reduced, on the tote board, to the position of fantastic long shots. Away from the track, deal ing with off the track bookies, the master mind had his agents placing bets on the dogs that did have a chance of win-

The winning dogs came in paying 9,875 to 1-and the master mind's operators had 70 winning tickets. That, together with winning tickets held by innocent members of the betting public, fixed the amount the bookles stand to lose on the single race at about $28 million dollars. They refused to pay and went to court contending that the odds had been illegally rigged. The decision has gone against them. They will appeal. But so far, the operations of the master mind have been ruled legal.

But if they had been really masterful, they would have been satisfied with odds a little less ridiculous, and a little more likely to be paid, and then have taken the bookies gently again some other day, wouldn't they?

A Businesslike Sport

By arguing that major league baseball is much more a sport than a business, its officials up to now have fended off the full might of the Federal antitrust laws. The baseball men may be in trouble, however, if they don't stop fishing up such far-out reasons to bolster Consider, for example, the comments

National League President Warren Giles on an antitrust suit against the Braves, who played in Milwaukee this year but plan, come spring, to be operating in Atlanta. Milwaukee County, which filed the suit, wants to bar the Braves' Georgia debut unless baseball gives it another majore league team.

It seems obvious that the Braves want to move to Atlanta because they figure they can make more money there, but Mr. Giles sees a more important reason. The transfer, he contends, allows baseball and the Braves to render "a greater service to the public. . . . I thought it would be a fine thing to take baseball to an area that did not enjoy it."

If Atlanta does not appreciate the Braves' public-service motive, and reward it richly at the box office, it's a safe bet that the Braves soon will see a need to market their altruism elsewhere. After all, it was the scarcity of rewards in Wisconsin that sent them scurrying to the

No one could quarrel with this profitseeking instinct, which is common to all businesses, if the baseball officials did not argue they were really not a business. The thinness of that argument surely weakens their contention that the laws, in their case, should not apply equally

Perhaps baseball teams could not operate without dividing the market among themselves and forbidding players to sell their services to the highest bidder; if so, it may be time for Congress to write some special rules. For it should be clear to all by now that baseball is, to put it mildly, a mighty businesslike sport, WALL STREET JOURNAL

Mr. Alcorn has developed, in defence of his proof those have you stopped beating your wife questions which is the dream of every advocate. It is the same kind of question Mr. Alcorn himself is fighting when he clashes, on the issue of the main Constitution, with John Lupton, the leader of the Republican right wing opposis tion to the Constitution. But the possibility is, whenever such innocently deceptive questions succeed in dominating a campaign, that they will wish and the specific possibility is that just as Mr. Alcorn may not quite succeed in piercing and pinning Mr. Lupton's clever questions about the main Con? stitution, so nobody else will aucceed in refuting Mr. Alcorn's blandly innocent question concerning his own proposition to write the word "necessity" into the State Constitution as part of its eminent do-

Mr. Alcorn's have you stonped beating your wife question is this, as expressed in his own carefully formulated language; "Opponents of it (the eminent domain proposal) should be asked whether they sinceraly assert that it should be constitutionally permissible to acquire by condemnation land not

And the answer is, of course, that nobody thinks land should be taken unless it is necessary. And that kind of answer could easily be translated next Tuesday into votes for Proposition Two, just as easily as some of Mr. Lupton's similar questions could be translated into votes against Proposition One. MAHRC Official Speaks to PTA

Donald Wood, vice president of MAHRC and special education teacher at Bennet Junior High School, was the main speaker at last night's Keeney St. PTA meeting. Wood outlined Manchester's role in teaching the mentally retarded. Te explained that one of the many functions of special education classes is to teach the children and, in some instances, young adults, to be self-sufficient, enabling them to cope with their every-day dealings outside the classroom. Wood displayed some of the work done by his students as a service to local merchants for which they were compensated.

In conjunction with his talk, film entitled "Tuesday's Child" was shown. In addition, the four special education teachers at Keeney St. School gave brief talks on their particular phase of Keeney's Mental Retardation ents were invited to peruse a wide selection of books in all grade levels, including books for preschoolers in the school library in conjunction with Keeney's annual Book Fair.
