The Forked Tongues

When Chancellor Erhard was Washington last week, observers there thought they detected him operating as something of a split personality. When he talked before the National Press Club, he was a West German hawk. He denounced "the call for peace and relaxation" between East and West as the product of "emotions and wishful dreams." All Russia offers, he said, is "the status quo in various disguises, with all its accompanying dangers." He publicly distrusted talk about the "transformation of Communism" and said that the issue of peace should be rifted out of the enveloping fog of Communist propaganda which plays on the Western love of peace." This was, in the opinion of Washington commentators, Chancellor Erhard speaking his own convictions, and the kind of policy he would like to follow. This same Erhard signed a joint communique with President Johnson and this contained an entirely different kind of language-almost dove-like. It spoke of "looking steadily for ways to overcome the rigidities of the past" and urged "new moves to remove ancient

That formidable old anachronism, former Chancellor Konrad Adenauer, greeted his return with a call for his replacement as West Germany's leader, and chose to honor only the Washington communique, not the Press Club speech in which Erhard had indeed talked as if he himself were Adenauer. Aiming at the communique, Adenauer charged that Erhard was putting the "Federal Republic in danger" and that the United States was more interested m improving relations with Moscow
