Davis Faces Six Charges Of Murder

State News

NEW HAVEN (AP)-Arthur J. Davis, who was recently declared mentally competent to stand trial, has been indicted on six counts of first degree mur-

The indictment was handed down Monday by a Superior Court grand jury. Judge Philip R. Pastore, heeding a request from the 26-year-old New Haven man's court-appointed defense counsel, granted an indefinite continuance rather than set a date for Davis to enter a plea on the charges. According to police, Davis is the man who invaded a New Haven apartment early on the morning of Aug. 26 and began firing indiscriminately at the men, women and children there, most of whom he knew. Davis was angered because his girlfriend, the daughter of the woman whose apartment it Guardsman Dies NEW LONDON (AP)-George W. McKenzie, said to be the oldest living retired Coast Guardsman and who carried the honorary rank of captain, is dead at the age of 102. Death came to McKenzie, resident of Waterford, at the Coast Guard Academy Hospital Monday. A native of Glasgow, Scotland, he went to sea aboard square riggers when he was 13, then joined the Merchant Marine three years later. After his initial retirement after 30 years of service, Mc-Kenzie was recalled to duty and served another six years. Funeral services will be held Thursday in New London.

Much On Death, So Little On Life'

There is something a little "mad," too, about the spectacle of Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish chaplains down at Yale joining in the effort to try to make use of the curious permission iven them by the United States Treas-$450 worth of medical supplies to be split three ways among people in North Vietnam, people in the Viet Cong controlled section of South Vietnam and people in the Ky government controlled

But whatever the cynical, practical mind may devise in the way of criticism of this whole curious affair dissolves, we should say, in the face of one sentence uttered by one of the clergy-

What Father Richard B. Russell said

"It is a mad world in which we spend so much on death and so little on life." That, in our book, comes close to explaining and justifying everything about this pitiful little flare-up, down at Yale, of rebellion against man's mass inhu-

If it were not for such groups, for such symbolic protest revolts, for such refusal to go along dutifully into the mass image of the wolf, who would be keeping alive the title of "man" and the its right to represent something more to mankind than an eager and obligingsearch for pieties which condone our steady decline into more and more bes-

This pitiful $450 which the great government of the United States is permitting a group of clergy and students down at Yale to spend for medicine on both sides of the war in Vietnam seems not even eligible to be called a statistic in comparison with the billions of dollars it costs a year to operate the war n Vietnam, or even with the millions, equivalent to four or five days of the cost of the war, which President Johnson is willing to pledge to the peaceful development of all Southeast Asia if the fighting should stop. But we are not sure that, for the future of mankind, this $450 is not the amount that is greater than either of these. There must e many of us who would neither care nor dare to contribute to such a fund who are glad that there are at least a few people who do care and dare.

Pentagon Controversy Coming

We are grateful for the fact that Hanson Baldwin, military expert of the New York Times, referred to a "confusion of statistics" when, the other day, he was reporting to the effect that the United States is experiencing both plane and pilot shortage in Vietnam.

It is difficult to match the daily and weekly reports, in which every operation seems a victory, in which all losses seem small in number, with any such general conclusion as that Baldwin

But it seems to come down to this: that, although the losses of planes and pilots are not in themselves numerically great-averaging only a little more, percentage wise in proportion to number of missions flown, than those in Korea 16 years ago the net result is serious when it is related to a non-accelerated program of replacement manufacture and replacement training.

This is going to lead, it would be our ruess, into a new controversy over the true quality of all the supposed expertness inside the Pentagon.

One question which is going to be raised is that of whether Secretary Mc-Namara, in his famous turn away from the theory of massive retaliation toward wars, neglected to begin in time to proplanes and pilots for such a

And it will also be asked, it seems whether the armed services themselves were really on the ball, fighting in adnoe and in time for all the present sit-

One early verdict can be rendered. It is that when Secretary McNamara, on his arrival in Vietnam, answered part of this controversial criticism by proclaiming that the United States now had in service in Vietnam more helicopters than all the nations of the Communist world owned together, he wasn't saying anything that proved anything. It was, in fact, one of the most meaningless statistics he has ever produced. Vietnam is the first war in which the helicopter has had a chance to operate, and may be the last, for it is not often that, in war, one side has total and unchallenged mastery of all the air. Under such conditions, the helicopters which are so invaluable to us would be worthless to the enemy, who would therefore be silly to waste resource manufacturing or trying to use them.

A Conservative Renaissance?

Whether the blush of optimism curently being displayed by conservative is justified is difficult to say. If there is a growing disenchantment with th "liberal" philosophy, though, a more pointed question, might be how well con servatives will capitalize on it.

We ought to make clear at the out set that by conservativism we mean the political philosophy based on individual human dignity and responsibility and not the so-called extremist right-wing groups which have tried to appropriat

Where, then, is there cause for conservative encouragement? Partly it stems from public reaction to the liberal excesses just mentioned. Admittedly the signs are scattered, but they are there. At the ballot box, for one thing. Conservatives have been doing surprisingly well in primaries, and even Democrats are conceding Republicans will make some important gains in November. But there are other, perhaps more subtle, indications that the iberal fabric is fraying.

Perhaps most visibly, the jittery stock market is nothing if not a glaring expression of national uncertainty. though a full analysis of the slide would include other factors, it would certainly not be complete without a recitation o the economic mess brought about by libresulting rampant inflation.

But if investors are wary, civil rights leaders are keeping them company. Nethey consider is important Federal help, out many are also expressing dismay at the hollowness of the politicians' bright promises. A growing number are at long last preaching that no progress will be made without strenuous individual effort, a central conservative concept. And no doubt the Negro groups that are heading on a more extreme course are similarly reacting to the same disil-

Even on the campuses that a year ago were marked by unruly antiwar and civil rights demonstrations, the young tions of the street march and picket line and are beginning to seek their goals through more orderly political such as working for the election of sympathetic candidates.

President Johnson, too, has been the target of increasing criticism, before which his political magic has a strange impotence. The promise of a liberalstyle "Great Society" grows daily more fiscredited, and even the once compliant Congress has turned balky. So all is clearly not going well for the liberals. Still, what the conservatives are being presented seems less s stampede to their cause than a general disappointment with what has gone before. A considerable part of the President's difficuties, for example, stems from the Vietnam war, an area where conservatives have offered scant alternatives. What remains to be seen is whether conservatives seize the initiative and put it to use.

How well they will succeed politically may depend on how well they convince the public that conservative ideology offers practical solutions to the problems of the day. That may seem obvious, but it touches on a difficulty the conservative "image" has always suffered—that it is a negative ideology. It is in fact negative in the sense that t seeks to limit Governmental repression and allow individual initiative to operate as freely as possible. But because it so often takes a negative form it also provides a ready shelter for persons who simply wish, for narrow reasons, to maintain an unhealthy status quo like racial segregation. It also offers glib opponents the opportunity to accuse conservatives of alcofness from such national problems as poverty, dis-Of course the truth is that many conservatives share many national goals with many liberals; they part company on the approach. One of the most serious challenges to conservatism is to present positive alternatives to liberal methods. Space program

Governor Dempsey commissioned the William H. Whyte report in '62 which led t the state's first Open Space program to conserve natural resources. Recommendation included state grants to towns and cities.

Under the state's new Open Space Program, 122 project applications for grants-in-aid (involving 8,000 acres) have been received to date from 61 Connecticut municipalities for parks, fishing, boating, wildlife habitat, historic and scenic

State parks and forests have been increased by 7,000 acres. 25 site projects for small watershed flood control are completed or initiated, and will provide 22 recreation areas.

The Board of Fisheries and Game has purchased 45 boating access points; 1,083 acres of marshland; flowage and bottom rights to nine lakes and ponds; 649 acres of river bottom land.

Since '61, over $38 million has been authorized for conservation and outdoor recreation. The Dempsey years have been the most dynamic and constructive in the state's history in conserving our natural resources and providing outdoor recreation for our expanding population.
