The statement made no reference to the VEA's decision this week to raise the minimum pay request to $5,800.

The VEA earlier this week described the $5,700 request as "rock-bottom" and "conservative." It said South Windsor's starting salary is $5,440 and Manchester's $5,450, while Vernon's is $5,300.

A Wariness Of Seeming Soft There is one way to describe the difficulties in Vietnam peace negotiations which is at once most charitable and

It is to say that everyone, on both sides, feels concerned primarily with the necessity of not surrendering whatever bargaining power it may have gained through its efforts in the military field, the world political arena, or the propaganda battle.

If we keep this wariness in mind, we find it easier to understand a number f things which otherwise seem infuriting hazy, or hatefully obstinate. Using this rule, one can, for instance, ilmost understand some of the recent levelopments on the nebulous Vietnam beace front. The other day Premier Van Dong of North Vietnam told Harrison Salisbury of the New York Times that Hanoi's often stated four points for peace were not things that had to be accepted and accomplished before negotiations could open, but merely the conditions that any common sense realistic negotiation would have to arrive at in the end in order to make any peaceful settlement possible. This immediately raised two questions. One was whether this meant anything new from Hanoi-a softening, perhaps, of rigid position. The other

This analysis was made difficult by the slight, tentative, almost purely semantic evidence of actual change of any kind in Hanoi's position. But, if we remember our rule, we realize why any sign of change, if it were there, would have to be very slight, and very re-

The United States, interestingly enough, went through several successive interpretations of and responses to the Van Dong statement.

First,-and this may have been when initial and disorganized Washington reaction and analysis took the Van Dong statement as nothing new and therefore quite safe-the Washington reac-Second, a few hours later, - when analysis may have grown a little less sure that Van Dong hadn't opened a door just a fraction of a crack - the Washington reaction stiffened and

In the first reaction, it was glad to see any sign of potential change in Hanoi, and would welcome clarification. This happened, of course, to be in line with the administration's year end assurance to Secretary General Thant that it stood ready to back him in "any steps" he might take toward bringing about the start of negotiations.

In its second reaction, a few hours later. Washington seemed to have become afraid of two possibilities - the first that the Hanol statement might possibly have meant something serious, the second that Washington, by seeming too cordial too quickly, might have risked some of its own obdurate bargaining power. The second reaction, herefore, seemed to stiffen the United States conditions for any progress toward negotiation back toward what they have usually been, which is something quite short of the "any steps" authorization to Secretary General

This constituted a familiar pattern in the long history of cold war bargaining. It has become standard procedure for one side to advance toward reasonableness so long as it felt it could rely on the other side to be obdurate, but to retreat into harder conditions of its own the moment it could begin to suspect the other side of turning a bit soft. When two sides are thus wary, they can fence for years and never actually come to the table. Each side comes to fear something more than war. It fears being trapped into some slight concession which isn't being paid for in some larger concession from the other side. To soft proposal, then, ever is allowed out front unless it can be reeled quickly in the moment the other side tries to go ing thing which has been allowed to lost out in no man's land for a moment the latest attitude of Premier Ky of South Vietnam, who has been making strange talk lately.

Where it has been his usual style to scorn the very idea of negotiations, he has now expressed his willingness t meet President Ho Chi Minh of North Vietnam in some third country to talk peace. In other statements, he has been saying that negotiations are getting closer every day. When asked to explain this, he says this is because our side is winning the war so speedily and conclusively. But, at the same time, the censorship arm of his government is permitting the newspapers of Saigon to carry news about various world initiatives for peace. By the rule of the game, it is about time for Premier Ky to lead the first United States mass bombing of Hanoi, just in case Hanoi thinks he is getting soft.

Super Super Super The first really super thing about it is that it is a super fraud. It is the temporary simulation of a world's series in professional football which was dangled before Congress and before the public in order to get them both to agree to the eventual elimination of all chances of real competition and real world series events, between two rival leagues.

Conceived as a super fraud, it may conceivably prove a super game when it is played on the field. We have no instinct to fault either of the teams One of them, we are sure, is a real football team; the other may succeed in becoming one for the occasion

But the other super attributes for the game and the day are dubious. We doubt that it is really the super super n the imagination and anticipation of many fans. We are not even sure it will

We are tempted to doubt that, from what we have heard of some of the television talents during the season they have spent warming up for this event, that we are going to get the really super duper announcing and camera coverage the networks have been boasting about for two weeks in advance of

One thing we are really sure of is that we are totally sick of the word super, and that it will take quite a struggle, if we hear and see it many times more, for us to drag ourselves into a viewer position on this super super

It was a typical political speech, generalizing, promising and pleading for the welfare of our "great state"

But the biggest cheer went up from the topheavy Democratic General Assembly when Governor Dempsey promised no increase in taxes and his unalterable opposition to a state income tax. How you provide all these new services and new programs without increasing taxes is something that never happened and never will and nobody knows better than John N. Dempsey.

Perhaps the best comment on the in augural speech came from A. Searle Pinney, Republican state chairman, who said. "The speech covered the waterfront and I don't think it can be properly evaluated until the budget message puts the final mest on the bones. A that point we can make a better judg
