Morton, Scott And Aiken

Last Tuesday was, in the United Senate, the day a few courageous United States Senators, reportedly prompted and encouraged former President Dwight Eisenhower, made a notable effort to save their party and the Senate and the country from a dull-witted refusal ever to esape from the worst fantasies of the cold war.

Senator Thruston Morton of Kentucky, the middle road former national chairman of the Republican party, led off this particular foray in defense of sanity and common sense.

He urged Senate ratification of the proposed consular treaty with Russia, nder which Russia and the United States would exchange better recognition of the status of each other's citizens in each other's territory, and under which the establishment of consufar offices would be legally permitted in both countries. It is planned, if the treaty is ratified, to limit this to one additional consulate in each country for the time being.

Senator Morton, speaking for the treaty, assailed what he called the timidity of the Johnson administration in showing its own support for the docment. And he assailed the pressure against the treaty, coming from outside Congress, as "hysterical opposition" stirred up by "fearmongers."

another former national chairman of his party, also contributed to the day's effort for sanity. The proposed treaty, he said, was to be for the benefit of American travelers, and not merely something we were conceding to Russia.

"I am not," he said, referring to one of the main sources of propaganda against the treaty, "going to be moved by the Liberty Lobby, or Nervous Nel-Hes, or hysterical people who cry about the Communist danger every time we try to do something reasonable."

And Senator George Aiken of Vermont, who is often suspected of having a mind of his own, admitted that he has been "deluged by professionally inspired hate mail" against the treaty, and then said that he would support it fif for no other reason than to tell these professional agitators they don't run this country."

But they are, of course, pretty close to running the country on some things, and one of them may be this particular The outcome in the Senate is touch and go, even after President Johnson's press conference attempt to present, as the last word from FBI Director Hoover, an assurance that the FBI could handle the increased surveillance problem which would be posed by the presence of some 10 or 15 additional Russians in this country.

The outcome in the Senate, where a two-thirds favorable vote is required on a treaty, is still touch and go because there is a certain part of the Senate just as there is a certain part of the population to whom the cold war has become the alpha and omega of American existence today. It is our reason for being, our alibi for our own failares, for our inability to shape our own destinies as all of us might choose to have them shaped, for our lack of psychological security in our own living and in what we have made of America. If we didn't have the Communists to blame for everything we don't like about our world, we would have to start holding ourselves responsible. A vote against this consular treaty will be a vote to preserve this fear this superstition, this alibi, this excuse for ourselves, and a vote to deliver us from any necesity for rational, intelli-gent dealing with the world in which sations, there are members of the United States Senate to whom the cold war and the Communist menace have besome a way of life. They themselves present a night of thought, and an insok and terrible as anything Communist ever mustered in its greatest days of supposed omnipotence. Senators Morton, Scott, and Aiken, with backing from former President Elsenhower, tried, last Tuesday, to speak as if they were representatives of a great, proud, and free people - great mough, proud enough, free enough to face world life with courage and intelligence instead of perpetual fear and

The Federal Food and Drug Administration has reversed its negativism of six years ago, and ruled that fish protein concentrate flour is fit for consumption by American human beings. We hope the members of the Comnission reached their new ruling honestly, which would be on the basis of personal sampling of the fish flour in ront of diagrams showing how the whole fish, eyes, head, intestines and all, is processed into the final product without ever being cleaned beforehand.

However it was made, the ruling is welcome. It opens the way to unashamed export of this food to other people of the world. It should give the fishing industry some touch of help as it waits to find whether people are going to eat more or less fish on Fridays from now on. It opens a new supply of world food at a time when the population explosion has everybody worried. And conceivably it may help promote fish into that prominence in human diets its quality and nutrition deserve. It will be economical, handy, and neat, and, we suppose, easily fashioned into one fancy dish or another. But it will never, if we may be par doned for saving so, ever begin to match, in any shape or form or cuisine, the pink skinless, well-cleaned bodies of a panful of three to a pound bullheads browned in deep fat for a summer Sunday morning breakfast.

Don Quixote To The World Coming from one of the principal architects of Vietnam policy, it makes pretty interesting reading: The United States, writes General Maxwell D. Tavlor, should not "become an international Don Quixote, trying to rescue the distressed and punish the unjust in every quarter" That refrain, which runs throughout the General's new book "Responsibility and Response," does not mean he has now decided it was a mistake to get involved in Vietnam and that we should simply withdraw. On the con trary, he sees little in the way of an acceptable alternative to present strategy and thinks our Government did the right thing in the first place. Significantly, however, he adds that it was "more from instinct than from sound judgment based on an analysis of alternatives and consequences. In other words, while realizing the bassador to Saigon is plainly troubled by many aspects of the Vietnam war and its implications for the future. We believe his is a perfectly reasonable

One problem in his experience is Washington's hair-raising bureaucratic approach—as though fighting a grisly guerrilla war and trying to deal with the successive "eggshell" governments n Vietnam were not enough. Here is part of his account:

"At one time we had on our books at the embassy in Saigon 21 military. 42 nonmilitary and 12 intelligence programs for which we were required to furnish progress reports to Washington. Since many of these were pet proj ects sponsored by some important agency back home, it was never easy to get rid of them." As for coping with those Saigon regimes, the General observes simply: "One cannot work effectively with a government which does not exist or which has just been formed."

To him (and to us) the lesson is as clear as it is important. The U.S. must take careful account of the political situation in any country it is considering giving military aid. It should not rush into places where there is no likelihood of political stability for the indefinite tuture. It should be slow to commit itself to any country until it has identifled adequate and compatible indige-

A degree of political effectiveness is not the only criterion the Taylor viewpoint would apply to future "wars of national liberation," as the Communists are pleased to call their mischief-making. We must weigh the consequences of intervention much more cogently and in a much more hard-boiled fashion than was the case with Vietnam. "We cannot afford to stake our world standing on a lost cause or on one with unduly high risks of failure."

The ultimate criterion, of course, is the nature and extent of the American interest. And that can be a very rubbery yardstick indeed. It is impossible to prove conclusively.

for example, that America's interests were sufficiently threatened in Vietnam to cause the kind of response that has developed. Our guess is that they were not. That is, the potential Asian threat to the U.S. is Red China, and it might have been better to meet it elsewhere, although once in Vietnam we cannot merely abandon the effort, But certainly if the Vietnam model were followed in the years ahead, the U.S. could be embroiled in too many places. Instead of assuming that the nation must fight against every single Communist outbreak, we believe the national-interest guide will have to be defined more narrowly. Is the particur occasion a direct threat to the na tional interest or only a vague, tangential one." And we suspect that as our political leaders will in fact quite careful. We hope so. In the meantime General Taylor has provided a concise case against casual intervention. It is a case for extreme caution and high selectivity. - WALL
