Scouts to Meet

Cub Scout pack 124 will hold its monthly meeting fomorrow at 7 p.m. in the all-purpose room of the Elementary school. This meeting will be the last opportunity for the boys to earn points in the competition for prises to be awarded at the annual outing scheduled for June 3.

Robert Hamilton and Terrence Gumlaw, who provided the adult help to the pack in their recent paper drive, wish to express their thanks to townspeople who provided the product for the boys to raise $40 for their program. To further forthey their finances the boys just completed an unannounced but successful candy bar sale.

What Century Are We In? There is something both touching and congruous, and, one must be afraid, iso fateful, in the excitement the diplomacy of this and other countries is dereloping over the crisis in the Near East, where the shooting has, fortunately, not yet begun, as compared to the dreary calm with which everybody takes the continued existence of crisis in the Far East, where shooting has been in progress for years, and is daily scalating in its ferocity and in its cas-

We had, yesterday, Ambassador to the United Nations Arthur Goldberg, in he Security Council, speaking as fol-"I am authorized to announce that Here was the United States willing either to follow United Nations principles, if other nations incline to, or to step outside the United Nations into a Big Four" power play of the kind suggested by France in order to get the correct amount of big power prestige and force brought to bear on the potential belligerents of the Near East. But when has the United States offored any similar eagerness for collecve action in the Far East crisis in which it itself happens to be one of the

Is it conceivable that the one crisis, that in the Near East, is considered a threat to world peace, but that in the Far East is not?

And does the United States really expect to be able to persuade the whole world, including those Communist powers eagerly looking for openings and inconsistencies in our policy, that the two threats to peace, the one flaming, the other still, fortunately, not yet exploding, are in two separate compartments? While Ambassador Goldberg was expressing our willingness to work either within or outside the United Nations to protect the peace in the Near East, exactly?" Senate Majority Leader Mansfield, obviously speaking less officially, was again advocating that the United Nations take up the actual conflict in Vietnam and try to arrange a face-to-face meeting of the principal parties involved there. How fine, and rare, but how frail a thing has consistency, has principle become in our current world mael-It is de Gaulle's France from which comes the proposal to take the Near East crisis away from everything else and into a "concert" of the "Big Four" powers, as if this were still a 19th century world. Changing The Game

One American official over in Saigon, who obviously needs the anonymity the New York Times correspondent extended him if he is to continue to hold his post, put the sad label on the latest change of American policy in Vietnam -that taking the "other war" into the hands of the American military. trying to help there, we are likewise de creeing that this is a land which is never going to yield us a victory.

Government Gibberish WASHINGTON — Federal officials don't set forth their ideas any more; they conceptualize. Poor people don't work their way out of poverty; they demonstrate upward The Army, Navy and Air Force don't develop interchangeable weapons and machine parts; they maintain common ality.

Weedlike, outrageous jargon spread through the Government jungle. It used to center in defense and space; now it contaminates the poverty and housing programs, education and health, manpower recruiting and transportation The pseudo-scientific patols of economists and psychologists and sociologists infiltrates the Government's welfare activities. The development of computers and system analysis spawns PPBS, which stands for Planning, Programing and Budgeting System, and so one Washington fiscal authority tells another, "We had a PPBS man working with us last week," or even, "We're PPBSing that program now." There is of course, some validity in using technical language. Jargonists claim that a certain amount of it actually helps communications—that the terms, conveying precise meanings, are a kind of shorthand that permits concise expression of involved ideas. But critics contend that's not the way jargon is usually employed. Instead, they complain, it becomes an impressive-sounding and impenetrable cover to conceal an absence of thought, or to provide a euphemism for an unpleasant or unflattering situation. The Pentagon, for example, says there is only a "frictional shortage" of bombs for the war in Vietnam, meaning the Defense Department has plenty of bombs but unortunately a lot of them are in Europe or at home.

Using jargon is also a way of demontrating that the speaker is part of the "in" group that really runs things. The man on the make refers to "overages" rather than "surpluses." He never says his superior has laid out a specific agenda for the forthcoming meeting; instead, the session has been carefully structured.

Consider this tidbit of Congressiona testimony, by a high-ranking official of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare who is an extremely intelligent man and who, in private conversation, ecommunicates clearly and suc-gated at each level in the program structure according to whether the expenditure is for research, provision of facilities, provision of beneficial services, provision of technical personnel or for administration and management." In plain English, the money available the department, is parceled out parcel is divided up for research construction and equipment, services, specialists, office staff and overhead.

Desfense Secretary McNamara tells Congress this nation must "attrite" uhTRIT, accent on the second syllable, which rhymes with "spit") the Vietcong; wouldn't he communicate better if he simply said wear them down? When President Johnson criticizes "Congressional add-ons" do people understand that he's complaining about instances in which Congress voted to spend more than he proposed? When an antipoverty warrior says a solution that succeeded in New York couldn't be "replicated" in St. Louis, wouldn't the cause of public enlightenment be better served if instead he said "reproduced

No more does the Government simply put together the best heads in different departments to solve a problem. Now it adopts a "total approach," which is, of course, usually "forward looking (no eyes in the backs of these heads). And the first step is to take an "overview" of the problem, or perhaps an "in-depth analysis" (in contrtast, presumably, to the erdinary shallow variety). Who'll do the work? Well, some mathematicians, some engineers, some social scientists . . . obviously a "multidisciplinary" group or alternatively, an interdisciplinary group, whatever the difference is. Their results are not merely expressed in numbers but are "quantified" and naturally the person most qualified to quantify will be someone "from a discipline which has a high quantitative content." The people who finally pass on the recommendations are decisionmakers (one word, never two) and their process is decisionmaking. The decisions, once made, will in due time be Programs are no longer aimed at specific objectives; they're mission-oriented. One group or program isn't brought into contact with another, and the outcome observed; the groups or programs are interfaced. Particular people needing help are "target groups" (you'd betply the poor but the underprivileged, the environmentally disadvantaged.

Computer terminology and allied mathematic and scientific lingo are pervasive. In reaching a decision or planning an activity, the conditions to be considered or the amount of available money (or other "resources") are the "input," the results are the 'output." Government men don't weigh the advantages and drawbacks of a situation; they discuss the "trade-offs." The factors that bear on a decision are the "matrices." and those that to some extent also limit the possibilities are the "parameters." When the results of a program suggest ideas for modifying that program or some other one, there's able "ize" verb. There are the old standbys like gradualize and finalize, maximize and verbalize. To "annualize" an activity means to figure out the cost for a full year—and usually suggests that its going to cost a lot more than originally calculated. Not even a maximized input of ver-
