The Prophet As Agitator

Monday, October 9

The role of prophet of dire, unpleas ant developments is in itself a dangerous role; frequently the prophet who foresees what is going to happen finds himself blamed for it when it does hap-

Thus Professor Gunnar Myrdal, the controversial Swedish social philosopher who has spent so much of his life studying the American scene and the American problems, is not honored in many American minds as the expert who was farseeing enough, a quarter century ago, to predict the severity of the recial problem this country is facing to-

In a majority of American minds to whom his name means a vague something, Professor Myrdal is much more likely to be classified as one of those intellectual radicals who preached and agitated, rather than merely predicted, the revolutionary social unrest we are now experiencing. In many minds, he is probably considered a partisan who is responsible rather than an expert who has been proved accurate.

All this being so, Professor Myrdal has now, in his address before the American Institute of Planners at Washington, turned to prophecy and warning once again. This time the danger he runs is not so much that he will be held responsible for what he predicts, if it happens, but a danger that his meanpeople looking for a cheap and easy evasion of the general problem with which he and his warning are concern-

What Myrdal said at Washington was that this country was, now that it found itself in the midst of the predicament he predicted a quarter century ago, in danger of over-simplifying it. The Negro, he now said, is only one part of the great American social problem, which concerns a whole "underclass" in our urban slums and our rural slums. "The poverty stricken Negroes," he said, "are only a third or a quarter of all the desperately poor in America." The "underclass" also includes, he said, "Indians, Mexicans, Asians, less completely integrated white immigrant groups, particularly from Eastern and

Southern Europe, and also a large number of the old Americans who have remained, or become, poor whites or To neglect this other membership of the "underclass," or to assume that we will enter the social millenium if only we manage to swing the Negroes u out of this "underclass" would, Profes sor Myrdal holds, be a dangerous process, which might actually heighten, instead of lower, our present racial differences and barriers. In such lecturing, Professor Myrdal runs two dangers. One is the old danger of the prophet on social problemsthat people will judge he somehow wishes to promote and inspire the trouble he foresees, that Myrdal, having forecast a Negro revolt successfully, now has begun the poisonous business of making the revolt of the Mexicans, or the Indians, or the poor whites begin to

The second danger Professor Myrdal runs is that of being appropriated, with sudden affection, by some of the very elements which have hitherto resented his interest in the American racial problem. Professor Myrdal has now said something which can be cheaply and glibly converted into something like this: "White people have some rights and needs, too. When are we going to take care of them?" Or, to interpret, there will be some who will use the Myrdal statement as alibi for easing off on efforts to improve the lot of the

The danger with such prophets as Gunnar Myrdal is not that they will themselves be inspiring and producing the troubles they pretend to foresee. The danger is that society itself will, following its hormal lassitudes and inertias, refuse to let its mind be troubled by unpleasant thoughts of its own morrows. The danger is not that the warnings of Myrdal will agitate unrest among that "underclass" of his. The danger is mind of what might as well, we sup pose, be called the "overclass" of the relatively affluent majority. It is a bit disconcerting, just at the moment when we are having national trouble enough trying to concentrate upon and solve the 'Negro problem", to be told that to try to solve that alone would be dangerous, to be told that what this nation really has to do for itself and for the fulfilment of its own progress is going to require thinking and planning on a scope we have not yet even imagined.

Waste Needs Haste

advanced as a nation to the point where we produce 800 million pounds of trash every day that passes.

Presumably the amount, having reached such an impressive figure, continues to escalate. Now one thing to remember about statistics in general is that they usually pose more problems than they answer. The knowledge of how much waste product our civilization now generates poses a problem nobody has been able to answer as yet. How are we going to dispose of it

A two day conference of national experts held at Washington recently discussed a number of weird proposals, but agreed on none as the ideal solution Frankfurt, Germany, has taken its waste and built a great hill just outside the city and built a restaurant with a view at the top of the mound. There are companies that profess to make a practical thing out of grinding garbage into compost, or using the heat from waste incinerators for the generation of electric power. And then there are all kinds of visions of golf courses, parks, off-shore islands, and diverkinds of sports and recreation paradises that can be created through the use of the sanitary land-fill method of dis-

Even though none of these methods seems to get any unanimous vote of approval from the experts, they still represent more ingenuity than has yet been devoted to the alternative proposal of doing something to try to control the problem at its source.

We keep hearing about the seriousness of the disposal problem, but the more serious it gets, the more we find ourselves deluged with packagings which are neither worth saving nor susceptible to destruction. The home wastebasket, which once might need emptying once a week, can now get somehow filled twice a day. The automobiles, which rot so quickly underneath from the effects of our chemicalized winter slush, withstand the processes of decay forever once they are retired to the vacant countryside. We are continually discovering ways of making and distributing things which are not

The Union Street Bench

Some thoughtful spirit in some capacity of official connection with the town government of Manchester committed a neat and thoughtful act the other day. Out of nowhere there appeared, on that very small triangle of parklet at the corner of Union and North Mains Sts.,

a pleasing park bench. This is, one can tell, a very nice bench to sit on, after mailing a letter, or while waiting for a bus, or for one's car pool, or while fust seeking a comfortable touch of that magnificent Oc-

But the most important thing about this bench, and the nicest thing about this bench is that somebody thought of putting it there. It is such a pleasant thing to think of somebody in the town government being so thoughtful and considerate as to see to it that a park bench was placed in the Union St. parklet that we have completely forgotten what we were going to say about the new stop sign at the same intersection. We have a vague impression that, for a day or two it was upside down. But we doubt that such a thoughtless thing with a sign could happen under a municipal administration so thoughtful about a bench.

other people in case of a riot?" That question was recently asked white Americans who own guns by the Harris Survey. The alarming replies, reflecting the views of some 27,000,000 gun owners who represent more than half of American homes, are published today. Exactly 55 per cent of these gun own ers answered "Yes." Only in the East, where 54 per cent said "No," was there a majority against use of private firearms during a public disturbance. These statistics reflect deep-seated
