Darker Hours For Greece

In the radio address King Constantine made to the people of his country on the occasion of his own effort to lead a revolution against the military dictatorship running his country, there was plentiful use of the royal "I" but little of the proof of majesty and power which royalty sometimes has to possess if it

The monarchy on which Winston Churchill staked everything, in his game to protect his share of post-war Europe from possible gluttony on the part of Stalin, has proved too weak to protect Greece against a dictatorship of the

There was a time when this probably would not have bothered Churchill, and probably a time when it would not bother the United States either. We came on the scene in Greece when post-Churchill Britain found the burden of maintaining a sphere of influence there, of propping up the monarchy, too heavy. And we have, in most situations where there is a threat of Communist advance, had a tendency to accept, as much the lesser of two evils, opportunities to support rightist dictatorships.

been edging toward a greater degree of wisdom and realism, in which we recogas strong a long-range assistance to the cause of Communism as they may seem a strong short-range repellent.

It is quite probable that Washington knows today, and has known since last spring, that there can be no real peace or stability in Greece-no reliable front against Communism there—until the present rough right wing dictatorship has been succeeded by something milder and closer to the political center.

And it can be taken as almost certain that we would have welcomed it if the young King whose acquiescence was probably a real necessity to the military junta when it first took over last spring could have succeeded, now, in his tardy conclusion that the junta poses irreconcilable threat to "the" moral values which were born in this land and from which all civilized peoples take their moral, social, economic and cultural development."

But, just as the monarchy upon which Churchill relied for the stability of Greece has proved weak and irresolute and has falled, so has the American involvement in Greece, devoted primarily to the repulse of Communism, but also hopefully to the development of an endemic democracy (what an irony it is to wait for democracy to develop in Greece) failed to produce its best ob-

The story in Greece is not over, with one specific development, like the flight of a monarch. There will not be peace or order in Greece, even should the junta now tighten its grip to the point where it seems successful in smothering all insurrection, all speech, all diversity of life and opinion. Monarchs, guns, and dollars, the chief gifts of the power politics West to the Greek heroism which fought so valiantly and so nobly for liberty in World War II, have not proved enough, not even for real safeguard against the designs of the power politics East. The Greeks themselves will again, sooner or later, manage to strike for and regain title to their own liberty. When they do, will it be too much to hope that both East and West will let them shape their own political institutions and destinies?

Good Sense And Good Grace Utilities District clings to its own existence, and there are phases of its work and policy in which it need by no means suffer an inferiority complex because it happens to be merely a district instead of a town.

But the present leadership of the District deserves a salute for both good sense and good grace in bowing out of any competition with the town for the acquisition of the Manche

This is a proposition, if it can b swung, at a price which is fair and reasonable, which has future importance not limited to any district boundaries. If, in expert calculation and testimony, it can be shown that this acquisi ion together with existing resources will guarantee the town of Manchester its water needs for the foreseeable fu ture, and if expert appraisal can testify that the price to be settled upon is fair, then the thing to do is to move to the transaction as directly as possible without quarreling whether it shall be town or district which has either option or resource.

The pronouncement of Eighth District policy the other night was, therefore, welcome. We hope town policy now proceeds, with such safeguards as we have outlined, toward the purchase.

The Rain Nobody Needs Periods of extended drought teach us

some appreciation of rain even when it After five years of unusual drought, we have now completed nearly a year of normal rainfall. Most reservoirs have seen full for some time. The ground water table is up to the point where it is just under our cellars. The ponds are brim-ready for freezing. Realistic reading of our present situation, then, says that there is no place for rain to go, these early darkening days in December, except down the driveways, down the sewers, down the brooks, down the rivers. Nobody needs a drop of it anywhere.

At this point, when it stalls up above and just keeps raining, for no need and for no point, the philosophical adjustment of the human being, who is alone among all creatures in having continually to ask himself why and then try to give himself some kind of an answer, shows itself at its expedient, com promising, resourceful best.

All this rain could have been, we tell ourselves cheerfully, a brand of precipitation called snow.

And, by thinking of that possibility we grow very affectionate toward the unwanted rain.

Adios The last son of Adios was sold at auction Thursday night, and now all the progeny of the late, great stallion are out in the world trying to earn their keep. He sired hundreds of champion racers and studs and broodmares, and he dominated harness racing more completely than any other male in any sport. Adios is dead more than two years now, buried in a metal box near the green apple tree he favored on Del Miller's horse farm outside Pittsburgh. Adios was not a lovable horse who nuzzled children and begged for sugar, but he was admired and respected and call ed "The Professional."

At his death, Adios was earning a $15,000 stud fee. He was servicing abou 45 mares a year, each with a kind of arrogant dispassion that constantly amazed and pleased his handlers. Standardbreds are rarely as jutery as noroughbreds, but a stallion of any breed is moody and treacherous, He may suddenly lose interest in females at the height of the short stud season or may wake up raging dangerously in his stall. Not Adios. Stocky, muscular and not particularly handsome, Adios was as a consistent as a mare in his personality. He was always tough, independent, selfish and smart. His stall and his paddock were private, he believed, and although he was never sneaky or vicious about it, he would attack anyone who This included Mrs. Miller, who was once bitten on a foot she extended unfer the paddock fence, and several farmhands who tried to get chummy and were bitten on their heads. He once charged a little old lady who crawled into the paddock to pick green apples. Adios allowed himself only one of two green apples a day, but he wanted them Adios liked Montovani and all music with more sweet strings than depth. In the hot noontimes, he would doze in his stall beneath stereo speakers. Now and then, a new groom in the stable might tune to rock 'n' roll or the baseball game, and Adios would wake up and start kicking. This would bring the manager and the owner and the veterinarian, and a stern warning that in this operation the horse called the tune. Adios's great value was based on the extraordinary power of his genes to overcome any deficiency in the breeding of the mare. These days, horsemen believe that speed and endurance are passd through the mares, but that truly great steeds are produced when the bloodline of a great stallion "nicks" with the dominant characteristics supplied by the dam. But beginning in 1949, when Miller started Adios off as a $300 stud for second-rate mares, the chunky stallion's genes "overwhelmed" those of his mates. By the mid-fifties, the sons and daughters of Adlos were winning races all over the country and his spring afternoons were being booked for years in advance. As his fee rose, Miller used expensive scientific methods to assure conception and wheeled the entire life of his farm around the February-through-June stud cycle. Visitors came from overseas to see Adlos.

There was that cool, almost mechanical, professionalism about Adios. Lesser stallions balked or became shy or went mad, but Adios's professional attitude made his function seem purely clinical. When he left the breeding shed, his groom, Stanley Davis, would croon in his ear, "You're the smoothest, old man, you're the best." Once a visitor asked Davis if he wasn't making a bit much of this mere norse, and Davis said: "He's a real man, Adios. He keeps his own counsel and better than pays for his keep." -ROBERT LIPSYTE IN THE SPORTS

A Thought for Today Council of Churches

Life makes so many demands upon us and the goal of excellence is so high and one's ability to use these divine resources seems so limited how can one find the answer of life. Here is where one's religion has another tool to offer. It is called Trust. Our limitations are also God's opportunity. He didn't make us perfect because He wanted life to be a cooperative venture of man and God. So He left a few empty places in our make-up so that we would grow to recognize our need for Him and thus join Him in the That is the meaning of Christmas, the forming of that Divine Partnership. Foreign Minister Willy Brandt of West Germany and the forsign ministers of Italy, Belgium, The Netherlands and Luxembourg made the decision at a breakfast meeting called by Brandt.

Firench officials said their position remains the same: That the six nations should discuss among themselves the consequences of British entry before making a decision on whether to open formal negotiations. They added that French Foreign Minister Maurice Couve de Murville had no objection to the breakfast meeting called by Brandt. Joseph Jay photo Brandt.
