MEMBER AUDIT BUREAU OF CIRCULA-

Friday, December 3

Change Filters Forward Thursday, in the community of Andiston, in the state of Alabama, an allwhite jury sentenced a white segregationist to 10 years in prison for the murder of a Negro. This is the second instance, in 34 "civil rights murders" which have been committed in the South since 1960, in which a murderer has been held guilty and punishable. The previous instance was in Florida.

That this much justice should now move into Alabama is progress-not progress which compensates for all the trials in the news which have been turned into farce solely because of the solor of the skins involved-but progress which shows that things are eventually going to be different everywhere as they have to be different if this country is to continue to live as a civilized community.

Everybody was surprised in Anniston the other day, the prosecution, the defense attorney, the white supremacist who was on trial, and, one can bet, the jury itself.

Perhaps the jury was the most surprised of all. Somehow, without any sharp advance warning, it happened that there were congregated in one jury box a collection of individuals who were not automatically stooges for the formula of farce which usually conducts the trials of civil rights murderers. Somehow, a different kind of current and feeling moved among them, and prompted them to the mutual discovery that they were willing to try something different this time. And the mutual discovery strengthened itself, until it won over the last hold-outs in its midst, and one more most significant entry had been written into a new chapter in the history of the South.

A day or two before, perhaps, a week before, perhaps, a month or year before, these same 12 jurors might well have been the authors of one more release of a known murderer. The chemistry of change, the chemistry of conscience, the chemistry of human brotherhood and equality keeps filtering forward, sometimes leading the law, sometimes catching up to the law, but, so long as it keeps showing itself, lighting the hope that we have not yet lost our chance to make the American dream a way of national life.

A Confrontation Of Less Restraint

So the United States made a great show of softening its policy toward Communist China and voted affirmative when the United Nations General Assembly decided unanimously, 112 to 0, to hold a world disarmament conference to which Communist China would

This meant that the United States was abandoning a slim edge of its effort to keep Communist China out of the United Nations, for this would let Communist China into a meeting being sponsored by the United Nations. It meant, also, that the United States was getting broadminded enough to be willing to sit down, in the same conference, with Communist China. It was true that our diplomatic spokesmen began, almost immediately after our vote at the United Nations, to impose after-the-vote conditions. We wouldn't sit down with Communist China after all, one of them said, unless we were convinced Communist China would be serious, and not just making propaganda. Nevertheless, here was the United States bending a little on the issue of Communist China. The next day Communist China had a reply which was instant, unyielding, "Under United States control," said Peking, "the United Nations has all

sion of the Chiang Kal-shek clique from

This, then, is what the United States gets for trying to be, a little bit more reasonable with regard to Communist

Or at least that, we suspect, that chain of reasoning and logic just presented above, will be the normal American official and public reaction. And that, of course, is just why our world is in the insoluble kind of bind it is in. We don't look at things through very clear two-way glasses. We condescend to a great big nation without ever thinking how we ourselves would react to some similar condescension. We judge others without yielding to others the right to judge us. We propose to yield to a country some fringe token of all the status of sovereignty that country already thinks it possesses in its own right. At the moment, this is normal status between Communist China and the United States. We condescend, and China snarls. This bitter, fruitless, exasperating clash of contradictory presumptions is bad and sad enough in itself, but all the chances are that it will get worse rather than better. On neither side of the Chinese-American confrontation does the leadership seem to have the degree of ultimate restraint and balance which has somehow enabled the Russian-American cold war to pass through the valley of the shadow of total war without sacrificing all humanity. In the Russian-American confrontation, both sides showed occasional restraint, and there were even occasional retreats which were possible because one side was careful to leave the other's road to the rear unblocked. But in the American-Chinese confrontation, the American leadership is inclined to be more reckless because it has somewhat less respect of all kinds for China than it had for Russia, and the Chinese leadership is inclined to be more reckless because, being a young revolution, it has at once more fire to feed and less domestic gain to lose.

If the rest of the world is so foolish and so abdication-minded as to let us. the United States and Communist China will seek each other out, sooner or lat-

An Unnecessary Proposal

A variety of organizations from the Connecticut State Chamber of Commerce to the Connecticut Expenditure Council have now come out in opposition to the constitutional change in the eminent domain provisions of the state We believe that the opposition is wellfounded, and further that Meade Alcorn's new plan to implement the proposal is just another illustration of how padly thought out a concept Proposal Number 2 really is when considered from all sides.

Alcorn, who led the fight during the Convention for the change, says a special session of the legislature is needed to deal with the question. And then he proposes a string implementing laws. But the trouble is that the Democrats have not agreed to the special session and nobody has agreed with his particular law to change the eminent domain laws in the state. The state is thus asked to vote on half a plan. We do not believe that this s the way to change the law, if indeed the law needs changing.

In this connection, it is pertinent to quote the view of the Connecticut Public Expenditure Council whose staff has studied the question. The CPEC says

If there is a need for providing additional safeguards to protect individuals from unreasonable or arbitrary condemnation of their property, CPEC says, such safeguards could be established by the enactment of appropriate legislation. When Michigan deleted the 'necessity" provision from the Constitution which it adopted in 1962, the statutory safeguards were continued unchanged. Similar safeguards could be erected in Connecticut's laws which, if they proved to be unworkable, could be corrected in any session of the General Assembly. If, however, the "necessity" provision were embedded in Connecticut's Constitution and proved to be unworkable, the situation could be remedied only by the slower and more restrictive constitutional amendment process, requiring a minimum of a year and a half for completion. CPEC research shows that:

1. Only three state constitutions have a "necessity" provision-Alaska, Maine, and Wisconsin-and Wisconsin, where the provision applies only to municipal corporations, amended its constitution in 1961 by providing that necessity must be "established" in the manner prescribed by the legislature.

It is not a recommendation of the widely recognized Model State Constitution prepared by a distinguished group of authorities under the sponsorship of the National Municipal League. 4. Until procedures under the "necessity" provision are established, there could be a period of uncertainty, disrupting the condemnation of private property and thus delaying the accomplishment of public projects, especially if no special session of the General Assembly were called quickly to clarify 5. The adoption of the "necessity" provision would almost certainly invite itigation which could be costly to the axpayers, and increase acquisition costs above those anticipated under MHS provides a very good opportunity to improve reading techniques. The aim is to teach the student how to read -to read with different purposes in mind. A good reader has several speeds depending on his subject matter—a fast rate for pleasure reading, a slower one for study. Several machines and workbooks are available in the lab which cover a variety of phases on the road to better reading. The eye training machines the Tachitron and the Read ing Eye Span Trainer, are used individually and help the stu-dent see more words at a time. This in turn increases the student's rate and power of comprehension. The reading pacers also improve rate and comprehension. These machines, the Shadowscope and the Reading Rateometer, conceal each line as it is read, which prevents the student's eyes from wandering over the material he just covered. This technique trains his eyes to move more smoothly and stops regression. The Controlled Reader is a machine which can be used individually or with a group. A film is inserted and one line of reading at a time is projected on the wall. This also improves rate and comprehension. A new reading pacer, the Individual Reading Accelerator, was recently purchased for the lab. It works on the same principle as the other pacers-a bar moving vertically down the page to control reading. The machine is portable and more convenient. Individuals respond differently to each machine. The wide selection of machines available makes it possible for the student to experiment and find which one is most useful for him. With such a variety of facilities, the reading lab can provide the student with personal attention in working on his In addition to the several machines, there are standard tests used, such as the SRA and rate and power builders. These improve comprehension, vocabulary, and rate, and have practices in notetaking and listening. There are also numerous books which provide pl ure reading and others which are useful in augmenting vocabulary and other skills. The reading lab is designed and want to improve their sonality found in Jeannie has (Monday and Wednesday). Ap-
