Parisienne. The remarkable thing about this dress is its remarkable beauty and its durability. True, it was worn but once by Mme. Montbaude, at a grand ball given by the Russian embassador in Paris, but no other garment at that gorgeous affair aroused half so much admiration as the frock of chicken skin. To appreciate the beauty of the dress it must be known that not less than 800 pieces of tanned skin were used in the making of the skirt and bodice alone. When the work of making the dress

Laundering In the Kitchen. Mr. C. F. Wingate, addressing a company of clobwomen the other day, said that the washing of family lines in the kitchen where food for the table is being prepared is far from a sanitary proceeding. The idea came with a shock to many of his listeners, who realized that this practice was one carried on every Monday in their kitchens.
