Bronze monuments in London have a hard time of it, and so have those whose duty it is to keep such bronzes in good order. Boehm's statue of Carlyle stands on the Chelsea Embankment, where with smoke soot, acid exhalations and dampness Carlyle was soon coated with oxides. Chelsea officials did- not understand the fine effects of a patine. They scrubbed Carlyle and got him clean, and next painted him black, following Fronde's ways. There came much fault-finding. Then the Chelesa au thorities removed the paint, rescrubbed Carlyle over again, and he now appears as a mottled philosopher.

The Prince of Wales has organized a "League of Mercy," with the immediate object of promoting the London hospital fund which bears his name, established, which will be conferred as a reward for gratuitous personal services rendered in the relief of sickness and suffering. None can be admitted to the order without the sanction of the queen, and the decoration of the order may be worn on all occasions, but gives no rank. It is distinetly stated that personal service only and not gifts of money will receive merit from this order. Anglo-Saxon bluejackets in Samoa are doing the work of the international police of civilization, says the New York Commercial Advertiser. British sailors have been doing this work all over the world for generations. In the last generation German sailors have enlisted in the international police. Though they have good will, the Germans have made some blunders from lack of experience. Now the American navy is doing its share of the work, as part of the regular international force, after some brilliant volunteer service with the British in China and Japan. The union is happy.
