of these insects which the thought less are apt to kill and maltreat provided a most entertaining study. Sir John's world is really made up of a lot of little worlds. When he is tired of the banking world, he turns to the political world; then, when he wants a change, he busies himself in either the wasp world, the bee world, the spider world, or the ant world-the last four of which are just as curiout as our own world. Sir John's private sanctum at his country seat is a receptacle for bees and wasps, and small wonder, seeing that a store of honey is always provided for their delectar tion. As the winged creatures come and go the master of the house studies 'their habits; and, as he has been studying them for more than a gener ation, it is not surprising that he knows almost as much about the insect world as the insects do themselves. The experiments which he has made with his pets may be numbered by the thousand, but how he has acquired all his knowledge one does not pretend to understand. It is not everybody who would care to trifle with a wasp Some time ago Sir John found a wast whose wings, were so smeared with honey that it couldn't fly. He watched it and presently saw a lot of other wasps-chums of the sticky one-come up and lick the honey off the back of -Douglas Zebriskie Doty. their distressed companion.
