One day a little girl who was tending some goats on the mountain came running down to her mother to tell about a beautiful lady who had just arrived on horseback on the monntain, accompanied by a little girl and a little how and a man, evidently a servant. The lady was very tired and had asked the little girl for some bread and milk for her children, who were hungry and thirsty. The mother prepared some milk, bread, butter and cheese and with her husband and little girl ascended the mountain and found the lady and her children sitting on a rock. The little boy and girl were as beautiful as their mother, and all three were handsomely dressed. The lady accepted the bread and milk with many thanks, and when they had satisfied their hunger and thirst the lady began to question the poor woman and her husband. When she learned that the village was inhabited only by peasants she seemed greatly pleased and said that she would rest there awhile to recover from the fatigue of crossing the mountain. She inquired if there was an nnoccupied house to be obtained, and on learning that there was one shewent to look at it, and declared it to be quite convenient. The necessary arrangements were completed in a short while, and the lady and her children with the servant, whose name was Kuno, took possession of the house.
