LOWER: Pale Blue Messaline

LMOST worthy of the event days of French dressmaking-now, alas, de-A parted—are the two beautiful evening gowns shown in the illustra-tion. They represent the efforts of two of the leading designers of the capital of the world's modes and created sensations when they were first exhibited a short time ago. Of course the splendor of the materials and the high rank of the makers render these gowns expensive in the extreme, but the astute Frenchman knows that Mme. l'Americaine does not let so little a thing as money stand in her way when she wants a costume that pleases her. The lower costume shown in the cut is a most beautiful creation of messaline In a delicate pale blue. Gold and silver lace are employed to adorn the front panel and the flounce on the skirt, and the lace is bordered by a flower pasdementerie in the silver. The flowers are orchids. The effect is best described

The other gown is not less beautiful, but is in addition more strikingly atfactive. The materials employed are black chiffon and Bulgarian bead embroidery, giving the costume almost the black and white effect that will be so popular in the fall and winter. Jet and pearls are also used to heighten the effect. As the nicture shows, there is a long train. Another beautiful feature of this handsome gown is the short sleeves, draped to fall in the most graceful and flowing of lines. The sleeves are of white chiffon, accordion plaited, cut in on the inner seam so as to show the arm when that member is raised. The pleces of the embroidery, matching the drapery on the skirt, complete one of the best sleeves seen in this year's gowns. Nothing more handsome than this gown is to be found in the most fashionable shops. AMANDA RIDDLE.
