Evelyn Bibb was with the strangers, and she stopped a minute to introduce them. They were her cousins from the city, Marietta and Morgan Bibb. Marietta spoke, smiled, then swept on her conquering path, but as she floated by she carried Jaspar with her. The little country girl was loft standing alone.

For a few minutes Polly was too heartbroken to hide her misery, her eyes kept following Jaspar, who seemed to have forgotten her entirely. Presently, however, she noticed that some of the girls were laughing at her evident discomfiture, and pride came to her aid. She was by nature demure and dignified, but now she filrted, fiirted desperately and determinedly and soon she was the center of a laughing group, and Morgan Bibb had ucluding Tickets, Hotels, sight-seeing etc $27.50 up Also independent tickets. Poily Whiting was the happiest person in the world, for she was to go with Jaspar Slappey to the first picnic of the year. "And you know, mother," she exclaimed, delightedly, "that means that I shall be the May queen."

When Ephraim Slappey, the butcher, married Caroleen Carney, a foreigner from Ireland and member of a traveling theatrical company, everybody in Botogee said that no good would come Botogee said that no good would come of it. Jaspar came of it, and then the pretty, mismated woman died and Ephraim, who had always been a Godtearing man, though rather hard at driving a bargain, was left with this queer child on his hands. The little Jaspar grew up in his father's shop, a gay, irresponsible child, devoted to the phlegmatic butcher, but no manner of help to him. Once when he
