Fat Producing Foods. The foods most conducive to obesity are carbohydrates (starch and sugar), albuminoids and the very soluble forms of proteids.

In many cases the cause of overweight is too much meat and too much starchy food, which is nearly always followed by copious water drinking Carbohydrates are the principal fat-making nutrients and might be group-than follows:

while the above named articles are all conducive to the production of fat in the body it does not mean that they should be totally diminated, but rather that the quantity should be reduced to the adjust needs of the body. As an example, the old method of treating diabetes was to omit afarch and sugar entirely. Modern science has shown this method of treatment to be incorrect. The normal body needs a certain amount of starch and sugar, and the fuel one puts into the furnace and the amount of work the human mechasinsm performs.

The true science of human nutrition is the ability to feed the body, both in quantity and selections, upon the things which it needs for the work it does.
