merry with the children she began to wonder why he did not appear.

When the bonfires were burning low and the spirits of the young folks began to show evidences of the hour, as young man in evening clothes appeared in the corway of the tiny bouse. Miss Leddon looked up at his face as it was illumined by the fame from a pumpkin lantern. It was the person who did live there did not recally the mental messages she kept anding across the weeds lenging to have those pumpkins offered to her for the liallowee's party.

At last she get up, put away her few issues and possells, closed and locked the windows and stopped out into the cap air. She would stop such ineffactive methods and go and ask for some of the pumpkins. It was not for herself that she wanted them; it was for all the children of the countryside.

Perhaps some of them lived in that way farm house though Cora Leddon hoped not—it was such a tiny house that it would scarcely enclose a famby of children.

She went quickly toward him and he held out his hand.

"I hope you have all enjoyed yourselves," he said, amiling at the expression in her eyes.

"Indeed we have," Cora managed to
