It is practically a double garment—consisting of two light-weight fabrics—an inner lining of soft cotton—an outer covering of warm wool—strongly held together by stitches wide enough apart to leave an air space between the two fabrics.

The wool absorbs the moisture of the body, keeps the cold out and the natural heat in—but it does not touch the skin. The sir space ventilates the garment and keeps it fresh and dry. Doofold has all the warmth of an all-wool garment without any of its irritating "scratchiness"—all the softness of a cotton garment without any of its sticky "chilliness."
