Market Yard flow you have been deared and the second with the seco ice, the people, without any conscious plan, had organized a news service of their own. They had fallen back on the primitive method of circulating information from man to man. The citizens' committee and the city officials, however, were able to guess pretty clearly what this movement of troops and heavy artillery meant. There was nothing in the lower harbor that possibly could demand such force except one place—the forts on Sandy Hook, the last remaining harbor de-feuse that still was under the American flag. Solitary though it was, so long as it remained intact it forbade the entrance of New York harbor to any hostile vessel. There had been wonder before because the enemy commander had not demanded the surrender of the Sandy Hook defenses under threat of bombarding the city, as he had demanded and forced the surrender of Forts Hamilton and Wadsworth.

Some of the vessels towed railroad floats with flat cars, on which were found in the shore the eye could perceive their unusual size. Other craft towed strings of small scdwa, and still others towed floating derricks.

The flottilla passed down the upper bay, but it did not go out through the Narrows. It disappeared in the narrow waterway of the Kill von Kull that winds between Staten Island and the mainland of New Jersey and connects with the lower harbor through Raritan bay.

The story of the mysterious flottilla spread quickly through a city whose lack of newspapers made its apprehensive curiosity only the more keen. Robbed of its news and bulletin serv-like the states and bulletin serv-like the states. The army was short, even under its plant of states.

The army was short, even under the old, economical estimates of more than 500 field artillery. To put the army of 800,000 volunteers into the field it would need at last 1,500. In the days of peace it had been calculated that the shortage then existing could not be made good in less than two years. Now, with half a hundred factories toiling, with blackened Waterviet rouring and clanging as never a factory had labored before, guns were bring turned out at a rate that promised to reach surprising dimensions when all the shops were fully at work.

But at best there were six months during which nothing could be done except to prepare. During those six months while the country pured forth its money prodigally to make up in wasteful speed what it had neglected during long years the invader could sit in the conquered seaboard cities and suck them dry.

The volunteers had to long every the could do!

That is the story of the invader of the first in the story of the invasion of the country as noon as money had in the country part of the treasury.
