How long would any European army that set out without reserves have lasted in this war? With reserves you fill the gaps made by death, wounds and sickness. England had reserves. Otherwise soon after the retreat from Mons her expeditionary force would have been finished. By filling up the gaps with reserves she was fighting with full best alions a month after. Sir John French had fallen back on Paris If the United States army had suffered similar disaster our 100,000 would have all been gone in three months.

We Must Have New Army System. Before we can have an adequate defense we mus, reform the army itself. We must have a new system. The European system is the result of hundred years' experience. It has stood the test of time and of this war. Hardly an Englishman who has been in bat tle but is for universal service. He has learned from his warfare the errot of a system which sends a man who is "down on his luck" to the recruiting sergeant standing in a public square or to climb the stairs in a side for the United States army."

Bad times means that more men enlist to fight for the fing as a last resort. In Europe the flow of recruits is the same year in and year out. The system is definite and dependable. There is a deep moral idea back of universal service, which every European realizes, but no American and few Englishmen realized until this war. What your country demands of you is your life. One man's life is worth just as much to him as another's, whether he is a day laborer of a millionaire. It is the only capital be has to give. In universal service you have everybody of all classes shoulder the percentage of desertions in our recommons skyerapors just across the rice: the system which, in a notion of 100.
