Many new lines have been built to give ample connections with the headquarters of military departments, state capitals and with the national capital, This has required large additions to central office equipment in adjacent towns and cities and large increases in the number of operators.

The great military cantonments in various parts of the country now under construction, which will house more than 600,000 men, will require a wast additional amount of telephone apparatus and equipment. In addition to the constantly increasing needs of the government for telephone service and equipment, we must also meet the great and growing needs of countless industries expanded and accelerated by the war.

Only by the most conservative use of every available resource can these great demands for telephone service be adequately met.
