Emerson says: "Always do witat you are afraid to do." This is a plendid rule for cultivating courage ut an even better rule would be, "Always investigate what you are afraid of," is the advice of Anne Boyan Mc-Call in Delineator. Examine into the cause of your fear; look into it, and find out what it is. When we go forward and investigate the things we are afraid of, we are very likely to find in them something ctually helpful. Is it the opinion of others we fear? If we could make up our minds to go toward them and try to understand them, we should find that, instead of things to fear, they are either things that are not worth troubling about or else they are things that would be an actual help to us. Going toward life instead of away ! from it, learning to face, yes, and investigate, whatever frightens us, whether our fear be a physical fear. mental one, or a spritual one, this is practicing bravery, and this at last is to attain to self-forgetfulness and

THE ROMANCE OF WORDS

T7ARIOUS efforts have been made to trace this name for the popular dancesten to the investigators going so far as to locate a certain Mr. Fox who owned a horse which trotted in a peculiar fashion and, because of which, he referred to one of the newest of dances (at that time) as a "fox-trot." But, while there was a man named Fox connected with the origin of the term as commonly used today, he was a vaudeville dancer, not a horse fancier. When this dancer desired to introduce a number of new steps into his vaudeville act, early in 1914, he took certain added to them a number of the entire performance as "The Fox-Trot, a new dance originated solely by the performers themselves." Society, eager to take up something new in the line of dancing, studied the fore the entire country was foxtrotting to the syncopated melodies which precisely fitted this reward that Fox received was
