CHARITY

COR some five or six years we have had a riot of charity appeals. There have been drives for this and ampaigns for that-tag days and all other kinds of days.

Rightly the people have responded with promptness and generosity to all the appeals, touching the bottoms of their pockets occasionally when the drives came very close together and always giving something, however litthe they were interested in the cause. The war was responsible for the most of the appeals. But the war is, terbuically, at least, over, and it would seem as if there ought to be a let-up and a good breathing spell so that pockerbooks may recover and charities get down to a normal basis.
